

The building was originally a saddletree factory employing prison labor. A saddletree is the frame for the leather of a saddle. Students worked with the owner of the building to realize five unique mixed-use visions for the property, each including a restaurant on the ground floor. Jefferson City residents were enthusiastic about and complementary of the students' work and hope to see this project move forward in the years to come.

